

Connect Kids to Family History

Jill Phillips
Author and Memoirist

EPISODE 50

[Quote]

“We are the product of the people who came before us. Learning from our roots, makes our children do better”

[Description]

In a time where we currently save every memory and picture online, what’s often missing is the voice of our grandparents and great-grandparents.

In this episode, Jill talks to us about what motivated her to write the book Lamdash Street, here post WWII family history. She discusses how today’s families can connect younger generations through family stories that provide valuable insight into ourselves and how to overcome some of our biggest struggles.

[Intro]

Jaison Dolvane: In a time where we currently save every memory and picture online, what’s often missing is the voice of our grandparents and great-grandparents.

Stories that helped younger generations understand where they come from and gave them tools for the future have been lost to live-streaming and comment sections. Yet, those lessons can provide valuable insight into ourselves and how to overcome some of our biggest struggles.

Jill Phillips grew up in a London that no longer exists, London in the early 1960's. The stories of her parents and relatives who struggled to overcome the trauma of WWII touched her deeply. Motivated by the stories, Jill recaptured that unique time to pass on to the younger generation through her lively and hilarious book, Lamdash Street.

In this episode, Jill talks to us about how today's families can connect younger generations and kids to their family's history, preserve family stories in writing and the surprising and enlightening lessons that come with understanding her own past family strife.
